There is a growing body of evidence that the use of a single, high-dose, intravenous bolus of morphine is associated with a high incidence of respiratory depression, hypotension, and other adverse effects. The use of a low-dose, continuous infusion of morphine has been shown to be more effective and safer than a single bolus dose. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness and safety of a low-dose, continuous infusion of morphine in the management of moderate to severe pain in the emergency department.
